

THE WASHINGTON POST NAMES PDRI A 2020 TOP WASHINGTON-AREA WORKPLACE

June 14, 2020 – PDRI has been named one of The Washington Post’s 2020 Top Workplaces in the Washington, D.C. area. The 2020 award marks the second appearance for PDRI on this list, which was acknowledged in 2019 as well. Selection is based solely on employee feedback gathered through an anonymous third-party survey.

“Now in its seventh year, The Post’s Top Workplaces list continues to highlight the companies that are leaders in the Washington-area in terms of employee engagement and satisfaction,” said Washington Post Top Workplaces editor Dion Haynes. “We had a record number of employees participate in the survey this year, making it clear that these organizations have made cultivating an atmosphere of support and respect a priority.”

“We are truly proud and honored to be included in this list again this year,” stated Elaine Pulakos, PDRI’s CEO. “As our organization continues to grow, it is important for us to know that our workplace and our culture is connected and engaging for our staff. The fact that this acknowledgement comes from our own employees helps to provide us with an additional view of how we are performing as leaders and as a company.”

“As a premier talent management consulting firm, being part of a work environment where our employees are thriving and engaged is something very important to us” said Pulakos. “It also helps us understand where things are working and identify and respond to areas where improvements can be made.”
